Description: The James Hunter Monument, also known as the Battle of Alamance Monument, stands at the Alamance Battleground State Historic site. A tall granite and marble column is topped with a bronze statue of James Hunter, nicknamed the "General of the Regulators." Hunter is clad in traditional, colonial-style clothing and holds the muzzle of a musket with the butt of the gun resting on the ground. There are four plaques on the sides of the granite column. The plaque on the left side shows a bas-relief image of a man being hanged with an inscription.

Subject notes: The monument's inscription combines the records of two different James Hunters active in North Carolina during the Revolutionary era: one a regulator and the other a legislator. The correct identities of both men were established by Vearl Guymon Alger in 1977.

Controversies: A controversy arose when Hunter's descendants opposed moving the monument from the Guilford Courthouse to the Alamance Battleground State Historic Site in 1962.

Location: The monument is within 300 feet of several other commemorative pieces.

Former Locations: The monument was originally dedicated in 1901 at the Guilford Courthouse battleground, and it was relocated in 1962 to the Alamance Battleground Historic site.
