Free suffrage was a political concept heatedly discussed among North Carolinians in the mid-nineteenth century. The ownership of 50 acres of property or the payment of taxes had been a prerequisite for voting in certain instances since the colonial period <sup>[4]</sup>. In the gubernatorial campaign of 1848, however, candidate David S. Reid <sup>[5]</sup> accepted the proposal of leaders of his Democratic <sup>[6]</sup> Party that this limitation on the franchise be removed, making free suffrage a key issue in his campaign against Whig <sup>[7]</sup> candidate Charles Manly <sup>[8]</sup>. Although Manly won a narrow victory, free suffrage had become important to many North Carolinians. In the 1850 governor's race, Reid won handily over Manly and the Democrats captured control of the state legislature. A free suffrage constitutional amendment continued to be debated in the General Assembly <sup>[9]</sup> for several sessions until it finally became a reality in 1857 <sup>[10]</sup>, when it won in a popular referendum by a wide majority of 50,007 to 19,397. Estimates from the era indicate that 125,000 North Carolinians gained the right to vote with the state's adoption of free suffrage.
