Free suffrage was a political concept heatedly discussed among North Carolinians in the mid-nineteenth century. The ownership of 50 acres of property or the payment of taxes had been a prerequisite for voting in certain instances since the colonial period [4]. In the gubernatorial campaign of 1848, however, candidate David S. Reid [5] accepted the proposal of leaders of his Democratic [6] Party that this limitation on the franchise be removed, making free suffrage a key issue in his campaign against Whig [7] candidate Charles Manly [8]. Although Manly won a narrow victory, free suffrage had become important to many North Carolinians. In the 1850 governor's race, Reid won handily over Manly and the Democrats captured control of the state legislature. A free suffrage constitutional amendment continued to be debated in the General Assembly [9] for several sessions until it finally became a reality in 1857 [10], when it won in a popular referendum by a wide majority of 50,007 to 19,397. Estimates from the era indicate that 125,000 North Carolinians gained the right to vote with the state's adoption of free suffrage.
