The establishment of this organization was critical to the survival of North Carolina's private institutions of higher learning, which faced 5,000 vacancies at a time when enrollment in the state's public university system expanded. To shore up this imbalance, the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities successfully lobbied the General Assembly ^[5] in 1971 to pass a law offering North Carolina residents enrolled in private institutions the opportunity to receive legislative tuition grants of $200 a year. Over the years these grants have made tuition for North Carolinians more affordable, enabling more students to enroll in private schools. Full-time North Carolina residents are eligible for a Legislative Tuition Grant, and financially needy state residents can receive funds through the State Contractual Scholarship Fund ^[6].

The North Carolina Association of Independent Colleges and Universities represents all of the state's 36 independent institutions, providing information and research for its member schools in areas including public policy and government activities. A sister organization, the North Carolina Center for Independent Higher Education, promotes independent institutions to prospective students and others.

Additional information from NCpedia editors at the State Library of North Carolina: :

The North Carolina Association of Independent Colleges and Universities is now North Carolina Independent Colleges and Universities, also known as NCICU. This title of this NCpedia article was updated in 2017 to reflect this change.

Today North Carolina's NCICU campuses confer 1 in 4 bachelors degrees and 1 in 3 professional degrees awarded in North Carolina. As of 2017, NCICU campuses together enroll 68,046 undergraduates and 21,892 graduates across the state.

The Legislative Tuition Grant has been replaced with the North Carolina Need Based Scholarship. For more information, visit the North Carolina Independent Colleges and Universities website: <http://www.ncicu.org/> ^[7].
