

Zion-Parnassus Academy ^[1]

Zion-Parnassus Academy

by Steve Suther, 2006

The Zion-Parnassus Academy was an eighteenth-century classical school located in Rowan County ^[2] about a mile east of Thyatira Church ^[3] (believed to be the oldest Presbyterian ^[4] church in western North Carolina). The school's founder (and Thyatira's minister), Samuel Eusebuis McCorkle ^[5], hoped to establish a school that would stress religious as well as classical learning. Its name recalled the Hill of Zion ^[6], the residence of King David and his successors, and Parnassus ^[7], the Greek mountain sacred to Apollo (god of youth, music, and prophecy) and the Muses (goddesses of poetry, art, and science).

Patterned after David Caldwell ^[8]'s school in Guilford County ^[9], Zion-Parnassus added a department for teacher training. For this reason, McCorkle's academy has been referred to as the first normal school in America. Forty-five ministers emerged from Zion-Parnassus before it closed around the beginning of the eighteenth century, as did many lawyers, judges, and state officials. In 1798, when the fledgling University of North Carolina ^[10] held its first commencement, six of the seven graduates were from Zion-Parnassus.
