Alexander County, located in the western Piedmont ^[6] region, was formed from sections of Caldwell ^[9], Iredell ^[11], and Wilkes ^[12] Counties in 1847. The county took its name from William Julius Alexander ^[14], Speaker of the North Carolina House of Commons. Taylorsville, the county seat, was named for either John Louis Taylor ^[15], the first chief justice of the North Carolina Supreme Court ^[16], or U.S. president Zachary Taylor ^[17]. Other communities of note in the county include Hiddenite, Stony Point, Bethlehem, Little River, and Millersville.

Approximately two-thirds of Alexander County is farmland. Although agriculture employs only a small segment of the county's population (most jobs are provided by the manufacturing and service sectors), agricultural production remains strong. The county ranks third in the state for its poultry output, fifth in apples (apples produced in the county won first prize at the 1900 Paris World's Fair), sixth in dairy products, and tenth in beef cattle.

Alexander County is home to a wide variety of minerals. The Hiddenite Gems Emerald Hollow Mine ^[18] is rich with emeralds, sapphires, garnets, aquamarine, smoky and clear quartz, tourmaline, sillimanite, monazite, and rutile. In 1969 the largest emerald in North America (subsequently given the name "Carolina") was unearthed in Hiddenite. The town also hosts the Hiddenite Celebration of the Arts ^[19], which features an eclectic program of musical performances. Other Alexander County events include the Apple Festival ^[20], the Taylorsville Lions Club Agricultural Fair, Stony Point Day, Mayfest, and the Vashti Fourth of July Parade. Alexander County had an estimated population of 35,000 in 2004.
