Granville County, located in the Piedmont ^[6] region of north central North Carolina and partially bordered by the state of Virginia, was formed in 1746 from Edgecombe County ^[17]. It was named for John Lord Carteret, second Earl Granville, who was granted the land of the Granville District ^[18] by King George II. The county reached its present dimensions after being divided in 1752, 1764, and 1881 to form parts of Orange ^[19], Bute (no longer extant), and Vance Counties, respectively. Oxford is the county seat, having succeeded Granville Court House in that capacity in 1811. Other communities in Granville County include Butner ^[20], Creedmoor ^[21], Stem, and Stovall.

Tuscarora ^[22] and Saponi ^[23] Indians dominated the many tribes that once inhabited Granville County. Settlers, mostly from Virginia, began to occupy the area after the Tuscarora War of 1711-13. Agriculture, particularly the production of tobacco ^[24] using slave labor, drove the early economy of Granville County, which, during slavery's peak in the mid-nineteenth century, was one of a handful of North Carolina counties with as many as 10,000 slaves. The county also had a sizable community of free blacks, including dozens of craftsmen such as the masons who helped build the homes of some of the county's more affluent families. The development in the 1850s of bright leaf tobacco, which could be cultivated in the sandy soil of the Piedmont, kept tobacco production strong in the county following the elimination of a slave-based plantation economy.

Granville County is still one of the largest tobacco-producing areas in the state, but with the introduction of manufacturing industries, the county's economy is no longer primarily agricultural. Manufactured products include apparel, tires, telecommunications equipment, cosmetics, and china. Camp Butner ^[25], a major World War II military installation, was converted for other uses, including a federal prison and state mental hospital. In 2004 the population of Granville County was estimated to be 53,000.
